

NEW TIME

The money:

Physical life has no intrinsic cost because it is priceless by nature. However, by legalizing money to cover the needs of physical life, the effect has not been social control. Money is a mental torment because it is not a true power. If money were genuine power, poverty would not exist. An economic system with real power would prevent poverty worldwide. Poverty exists precisely because money is not power; it is a regime that controls and manipulates people's physical lives. As a regime, and because people have basic physical needs, those needs must be met through the economic system. Since it is mandatory to cover the needs of physical life with money, and since money is not a power capable of meeting the needs of all people, the result is the torment we experience today. Because money is a legal invention for meeting one's needs, those without legal options to obtain it are manipulated. Currently, people who endure the torment of murder, robbery, drug trafficking, and prostitution are manipulated into these jobs in exchange for money. They are coerced into doing evil to acquire it. Material things have a cost-free origin because they materialize from thoughts of intangible origin. Thoughts have no cost and are not controlled by money. They should be shared as part of life in partnership, and another type of system could exist without tormenting people as money does today. The correct regime for world governments should be one of service to the people, without monetary interventions. In such a system, the physical lives of citizens directed by the government would not affect mental health through desperation and torment, as currently happens with the lack of money. The creators of material things, houses, cars, and so forth, must be administered by the government. The needs of human beings should be covered for free because these things are made from the mind, and the mind has no cost. In this way, taking control of material things without the existence of money would create a system of sharing. This aligns with the nature of physical life, using the feeling called ego, which is a sense of superiority.

This feeling should be used to provide people with material necessities of equal value to live without the torments that affect mental health through despair, as money does. That is why material things are made from the minds of human beings, not made with money. They should be shared without money for a functional world. The nature of work should not be dictated by rigid schedules because they affect human health. Not resting freely, combined with worry, can cause death. The freedom to work exists when a person feels completely free from exhaustion. People should work only when they are at their peak energy, without affecting human freedom, unlike the current system of money and scheduled labor. This does not happen because government personnel, presidents, politicians, and others, are not guided by true ideology or intelligence to implement a functional government. That is why life is not valued as an opportunity: world governments are administered through ideology and fraudulent intelligence. The nature of physical life is to rest more and work less so that life is better valued and lived day to day with satisfaction. Otherwise, people who are exhausted from work have their time taken from them; they perform tasks but do not truly live. Money is never compatible with people's physical lives because it is not the nature of physical life. The real effect of money is to inconvenience people's physical lives. The existence of money is to manipulate people with needs or those who believe in money, so that most commit evil in exchange for resolving the economic need that corners them. It is the legal economy, and supposedly, needs are resolved through it. Anyone who does evil, whether in music, film acting, or drug trafficking, never receives mental happiness from the origin of how that economic wealth was acquired. All people who live with money live from the government, whether they work or not, because money comes from the government. People who live without money are people who do not live from the government. They live from the nature of physical life. They live from nature as it was before the existence of money, and not in poverty. People who do not live off the government, because they do not live off money, are happy because they have no worries. Because money manipulates, peace of mind exists only when there are no worries. Worries are the means of mental access through which people live in torment today. Money must be eliminated, or given away to be eliminated.

The sale of drugs, theft, fraud, prostitution, and other crimes exist because of economic necessity. People live in a deadly economic regime, which is worrying because those who founded it were political atheists with economic ideals of atheism. The reality of money is that it is a tax for people to benefit from material things controlled by those who have money, to the exclusion of those who have none. In this way, the government has been the victim of believing it is healthy to control people with money. Since the ways of obtaining money are not updated, money is not an effective control of material things because it affects the quality of life of those without money. These individuals often lack the tools to obtain it, especially with criminal records damaged by past mistakes. The failure to update the ways to obtain money has the effect of denying physical life, leading people without money to choose divorce, suicide, or not having children. They commit suicide because the system affects them. They do not have children because they have no money or work. Since money belongs to the government, government personnel are aware of these dysfunctions. They do not update them due to a lack of political capacity, believing that everything is solved by making people work. This fraudulent thinking has prevented the methods of obtaining money from being updated. Being globally equal in physical bodies only, but not in capacities, is the origin of the lack of money that causes suffering for people who are not creative, entrepreneurial, or business owners. The response of political thought to these people is to employ them, and according to political thought, the problem is resolved by employing them. But people left without employment opportunities turn to government aid, where their suffering continues because the benefits are not enough to survive economically. Those who work continue to suffer because the salary is insufficient, and government benefits are also inadequate. The economy is always suffering because it is a system with the deadly effects mentioned above. It is a fraudulent way of carrying out social control. Political thinking intended to control material things with money, but the effect is not what politicians intended. The effect caused by money is to eliminate feeling in human beings and to make humans live without the sentiment of doing favors for others.

Since the economic system is a fraud, those who believe in money believe in fraudulent power. Money is not power because it does not create human beings. True power lies in heterosexual sex, which creates human beings. Heterosexual sex in animals creates animals permanently, so that human and animal life never ends in all future times, through heterosexual sex between female animals and male animals, and between human women and human men. Power is not money. Money, as a counterattack, is a storm in the minds of human beings that connects them with human sadness and with the discomfort of human life. The economic system creates poverty in people. Since money is a scam, politicians fall into a fraudulent mindset to make them believe it will function as social control. Once they fall into the trap, they approve this economic system for the people, unaware of its effects. The effect turned out to be different from what was intended. It is the same one we experience today: mental torment, suicides, thefts, drug trafficking, need, abandonment, and poverty for those who depend on money. It creates a distinction between those who have money and those who are deemed worthless. It is a lie that money is a means of social control, because the reality is different. Primarily, there is the mental torment that people cause over time and death from strokes. This type of economic fraud that governments have created, this political mentality, is fraudulent because it puts a price on the physical body. The physical body, by necessity, has no total cost. It is such a fraud to claim that money is life. Since money is not equal for everyone, it is the source of suicides, murders, thefts, humiliation, despair, and obstacles to living. Politicians, with little intelligence, assume that human beings are basically similar because everyone has a physical body. But in abilities, no one is equal. The economy creates inequality because not everyone has money. It connects with sadness, despair, fear, and mental torment that can cause death over time from living under the constant pressure of earning money. This is how people live under the current economic system. Politicians, with little intelligence, have generalized that everyone is equal when not everyone has the capacity to be creative, entrepreneurial, intelligent, or to obtain university degrees in all existing professions to boost the economy, due to differences at birth.

Politicians spend millions of dollars creating prisons when the vast majority of prisoners are incarcerated for having committed illegal acts due to a lack of money. It is not because they enjoy committing illegal acts that lead to imprisonment. There are not enough jobs for everyone, and need drives them to seek money by any means. Money, instead of making human life possible, is an impediment that mentally torments physical life. It deprives human beings of youthful freedom, enslaving them to the economic system through constant labor. Without a proper form of government, people achieve economic peace only in old age, while youth is lost through constant labor. When people achieve economic peace, they lack the youth to enjoy it due to their age, and this happens because of the economic system. This is how the economic system affects people, preventing them from peacefully enjoying the only opportunity for life in the world. Normally, the economic system does not create material goods, but human beings do. Money brings nothing to people because it is a fraud that impedes human mental freedom. As a result, money guides and induces people to do bad things, whether small or very harmful, in exchange for earning money. The correct way to implement an economic system is to allocate adequate funds to each family's bank accounts to fairly support them while the government or the individual seeks and reports employment. This would avoid losses from mortgages and car loans. A labor law should be created stipulating that everyone must work by law. Those who refuse to work after the government has found jobs for them should have their designated funds eliminated, while allowing people to earn their income through self-employment. Updating work methods so there is a balance between work and life, so that people's time is not wasted, consists of dividing the month in half. That is, having people work two weeks and enjoy two weeks of vacation by dividing the staff in half at the workplace. By dividing the staff, the first half would work two weeks, paying the wages of the other half, who are on vacation for two weeks. When that half returns from vacation, they would pay the wages of the other half who went on vacation. In this way, people's mental health and freedom are not affected by pressure and desperation. This division of work and life time is fair and divides freedom in half.

Nor will it affect forms of salary payments, whether weekly, monthly, or biweekly, since everything would be updated and divided in half, thus benefiting people's freedom. One of the most common mental frauds is to think that money belongs to the people because people work for it. This is completely false. Money belongs to the government because people are simply an economic movement driven by needs. The truth of everything lies in the effect, not in the appearance. Natural Life vs Invented Life: Natural life is where people depend on nature: organic food from crops, peace of mind, houses built in cost-free spaces, where light comes from the day and food comes from the ground. These are people who do not depend on money. They live from their independent intelligence. Although natural life and invented life have a big difference, natural life is for everyone equally and with peace of mind that connects with human happiness. An invented life is one in which people depend on others, such as those who depend on money created by others and material goods created by others. These goods are created for economic gain, regardless of whether they have a mortal effect on humans. Since these goods are created for economic gain, manufacturers do not care about the mortal effects they may have on people. Very few material goods purchased with money actually work. Money is often presented as power, deceiving people into believing it is worth more than life, when in reality, it is a real appearance with a fraudulent depth due to its effect of being hard to obtain. Invented life has an appearance of comfortable, superior, updated, and easier status, but it is only a true appearance with fraudulent depth because it looks comfortable. However, the fraud is that you do not live as comfortably as it appears because you have a constant mental storm of earning money and worrying about having money so as not to lose that quality of life. These are deaths that occur suddenly due to a lack of mental peace all the time. The economy offers an updated quality of life in exchange for people living with mental torment, worries, fears, no peace of mind, no mental free, and for people to live until those mental torments kill them. Today, if people know the truth about this economic system and abandon it because of its deadly consequences, their needs force them not to abandon it. They are tied to it for all their lives.

If cash is eliminated, deaths from drug addiction, will be eliminated because drug trafficking is carried out with cash since it is not legal, and drugs will cease to exist. Unlike ordinary people, wealthy individuals, thanks to inheritances or other sources of wealth, live in these properties and suffer just like a poor person from a lack of real human love and real friendships. Their suffering comes from not knowing if the people around them are sincere or just pretending because of their wealth or fame. Luxury looks good and creates a feeling of comfort, satisfaction, happiness, and a dream come true. That is the image people have of luxury, but it is a lie to say that image is happiness and that living in luxury is inner happiness. That is a fraud because it does not compare to the real sexual experience of true love. Material things, even the greatest wealth, are just material. There is no way to reach inner happiness like sex or making love. The happiness that houses, cars, and being a millionaire supposedly give you is false, because people who have these luxuries live tormented by the fear of going broke. Money has a purpose. If you do not invest it and double its return, fear takes over your mind to avoid hitting that breaking point. The worry is constant, and that kills your peace and mental happiness. Famous singers and actors, whether they came from poverty or not, are often haunted by the effects of their fraudulent arts. They cannot sleep because of the mental weight these arts carry for life if they do not walk away from them. Also, people who are not artists suffer mental disorders from childhood, thinking that being a millionaire and having money as power over everything is the norm. They think that leads to happiness and that money will erase that past, but the impact on human life is different. It created a false divide between rich and poor, stopping everyone from having necessities. It makes people believe money is worth more than human life, leading to death in slums, rural areas, and other vulnerable places where people live and die of hunger. Death also comes from people who traffic drugs to make money. It devalues life by making people work more and live less. Luxuries and lack of money are almost impossible to attain, and they try to fake true physical happiness, which is the human body. When you get money, it makes you feel like you have achieved real physical happiness. That defrauds the feeling of true human happiness that comes from true love between heterosexual men and women.

Conclusions:

- 1. There's a persistent myth that money creates the goods we use. It doesn't. Money doesn't build anything.
- 2. The raw materials and tools we rely on come from the earth, and in their natural state, they're free. It's human labor that turns those resources into the products that make life comfortable products that, in a just system, would be available to everyone.
- 3. But we've been sold a different story. The economic system trains us to believe that money is the source of everything material. That belief is false, and it survives because the system obscures how things actually get made.
- 4. The trick is simple: no money, no access; money, and suddenly the door opens. That conditioning makes money feel like the origin of goods, when in reality money was invented to pressure people into producing things using resources the planet gives us for free.
- 5. Strip it down, and material goods don't have a cost. Nature doesn't charge us. The idea that we have to "buy" them is the sleight of hand because money doesn't manufacture anything. People do. People labor within a monetary system designed and enforced by governments.
- 6. That's why poverty isn't a law of nature. It's a product of an economic framework that has duped the public and policymakers alike into mistaking money for the source of wealth.
