

Origins of being a woman:

Men are typically perceptive about a woman's attitudes and intentions. If a woman seems motivated by immigration status or financial gain, or if she openly looks at other men in public, a man may suspect that her interest is not genuine. He may conclude that she is seeking immigration benefits or money, or that she is being unfaithful. When a woman clearly communicates that she has no ulterior motives, a man feels secure. He responds with love and confidence because he has no reason to believe he is being used or deceived. Problems arise when a woman has hidden motives or is unfaithful and tries to conceal it with lies. A man may pretend to believe her, but his doubt remains. That lingering suspicion prevents him from feeling comfortable or happy. Over time, this unresolved tension can lead to conflict and is one contributing factor to domestic violence. When a woman asks a man for material things, he may still question her motives. However, if she provides a logical explanation and he sees a legitimate need, he is usually willing to help. When a woman expresses love, a man may be skeptical if the expression appears to lack a clear reason. But when love is demonstrated through consistent actions and logical reasons, he is more likely to trust it. Most men do not prefer sex that feels scheduled or rushed. They prefer a natural progression: flirtation, suggestive clothing, a degree of playful resistance, and spontaneity. Unplanned moments tend to feel more emotionally meaningful. Many men also privately appreciate it when a woman wears makeup during intimacy because it enhances her physical features. They rarely mention this preference because stating it openly often reduces the excitement. Physiologically, a woman's sexual sensation is often most intense along the inner walls of the vagina, where friction from the glans of the penis produces pleasure. Although some women may feel inferior or used depending on the circumstances of sexual activity, the man's intent is generally to achieve mutual satisfaction. Feelings of inferiority are sometimes used to convince women that the only way to avoid feeling "used" is to choose deceptive alternatives, such as partners who misrepresent themselves or rely on artificial devices that may be harmful.

Men tend to adopt a “trust but verify” mindset because infidelity and betrayal are real risks. When a woman demonstrates loyalty through consistent and rational behavior, it eliminates the basis for suspicion and reduces the likelihood of conflict or domestic violence. In this view, the man is considered the woman’s guide, and the woman is responsible for holding him accountable if his guidance is flawed. The role of “guide” does not imply that the woman is inferior. Instead, this concept places the burden of responsibility on the man, which, in theory, relieves the woman of certain stresses. A man is generally willing to accept that responsibility if the woman reciprocates with genuine love, faithfulness, and no financial ulterior motives. That is the exchange he expects.

Traditionally, one rationale for women not working outside the home was protection: to shield them from crimes such as kidnapping, assault, murder, rape, and fraud. Offenders, who are statistically more often men, tend to target women because of perceived physical vulnerability. A criminal may hesitate to attack another man, anticipating resistance, but may act more readily against a woman. Menstruation is biologically linked to fertility and childbirth. Once pregnancy begins, menstrual periods stop for the duration of gestation, which is typically nine months, or less in cases of premature birth. In terms of biological reproduction, women are uniquely capable of giving birth. People suffer when they lie to each other for selfish reasons. They do this because real love is missing. Without love and honesty, relationships end. Here are two common examples. A woman might stay with a man for his money. She uses him for comfort or support. She does not love him. This happens often. A man might stay with a woman because she is physically attractive. He feels no real connection to her. He wants her looks or her money. This also happens often. Relationships built this way are painful. The people feel alone, even though they appear to be a couple. Cheating becomes likely. They pretend to be in love. But at work or in public, the woman meets other men. The man meets other women. If real love exists, cheating can force the couple to change. But mutual love is rare. It is hard for men and women to find. When they do find it, their love is real. It lasts. Money and other material things do not matter.

The origin of a man's behavior:

Women are typically attuned to a man's attitudes and intentions. If a man seems preoccupied with his immigration status, focused on sexual motives, or openly looks at other women in public, a woman may suspect that his interest is not genuine. She may conclude that he is pursuing immigration benefits, sex, or is being unfaithful. If none of those issues are present because the man has clearly explained that he has no ulterior motives a woman feels secure. She responds with love, courage, and fidelity because she has no reason to believe she is being used for immigration purposes, sex, or that she is being deceived. Problems arise when a man is motivated by sex, is unfaithful, and tries to hide it with lies. A woman may pretend to believe him, but the doubt remains. That lingering suspicion prevents her from feeling comfortable or happy. Over time, this unresolved tension can lead her to express herself with anger or violence, and it is one contributing factor to domestic violence. When a man quickly pushes for sex, a woman may still suspect that his motives are purely sexual. However, she relies on his actions and on time to decide whether to trust him. If he demonstrates, through logic and consistent behavior, that his interest goes beyond sex, she is more likely to believe in him and remain faithful long-term. When a man expresses love, a woman may be skeptical if the expression seems to lack a clear reason. But when he communicates his feelings with logical, consistent reasons, she is more likely to trust him. In terms of intimacy, most women do not prefer sex that feels planned or rushed. They do not want a man to go directly to intercourse. A woman typically prefers a gradual approach: when a man breathes on her neck, kisses her throat and her whole body, and slowly stimulates her through her underwear with his hand. This buildup is what leads many women to close their eyes and fully experience their femininity. A woman often enjoys having her thighs and entire body kissed, creating a tickling sensation as she becomes aroused while waiting for her partner to reach her vagina. She also tends to like having her buttocks caressed and squeezed with moderate pressure neither too soft nor too hard to create that same tickling pleasure, rather than being spanked, which often results from a lack of sexual awareness.

Physiologically, a woman's sexual feel is often most intense along the inner walls of the vagina, where friction from the glans of the penis produces pleasure. This stimulation creates the feeling of sexual "tickling" that many women associate with deep emotional and physical satisfaction. Some women feel inferior or used based on how a man engages in sex, but the man's intent is usually to achieve mutual sexual satisfaction. Feelings of inferiority are sometimes exploited to convince vulnerable women that the only way to avoid feeling "used" is through deceptive alternatives such as partners who misrepresent their gender, or by relying on artificial devices that may carry health risks, including unproven claims about cancer. A woman typically relies on time and consistent actions to build trust, especially given the emotional distress that infidelity can cause. When a man demonstrates fidelity through logical, consistent behavior, he removes the grounds for suspicion. Without a reason to doubt him, a woman is more likely to remain faithful. In this perspective, the man is seen as the woman's guide, and the woman is responsible for holding him accountable if his guidance is flawed. She should address any concerns with him directly. The role of "guide" does not mean the woman is inferior to the man. A man is generally willing to accept that responsibility as long as the woman reciprocates with genuine love, faithfulness, and no financial ulterior motives. That is all he asks in return. Traditionally, one rationale for women not working outside the home was protection: to shield them from violent crime, including kidnapping, murder, assault, rape, fraud, and other forms of abuse. Perpetrators of these crimes are statistically more often men, and they may target women due to perceived physical vulnerability. A criminal may hesitate to attack another man, anticipating resistance, but may act more readily against a woman. Women's menstrual cycles are biologically linked to fertility and personal hygiene. Each woman manages her own grooming preferences, and many choose to keep the pubic area shaved for comfort and cleanliness. Menstruation is directly tied to reproductive availability. Once pregnancy begins, menstrual periods cease for the duration of gestation, which is typically nine months. In cases of premature birth, this period may be as short as six months and fifteen days.

The physical reality of being male and female:

Women often live with uncertainty about whether a man's words are sincere. Because some men do lie, many women struggle to feel secure, fearing that the relationship could end in infidelity. Marriage should not be treated as a celebration or a business transaction. Legal marriage primarily exists to protect assets in the event of divorce. But in marriages founded on genuine love, there is neither infidelity nor divorce.

A real marriage never ends in divorce:

Before marrying, a couple should have a clear understanding of their own feelings. They should have met other people they find attractive and still feel certain about their commitment. That way, they know their bond is based on choice, not comparison. Too often, legal marriages are entered into with unspoken financial or property expectations. When divorce becomes advantageous, these marriages fail because they were built on self-interest, not love. Pure marriages are different. In them, both partners are fully invested in each other's lives. They remain attentive, caring, and honest about their feelings. In a marriage built on true love, the woman sees the man as her source of strength and intellect. The man sees the woman as his most intimate partner, the mother of his future children, and his deepest source of mental and sexual feelings.

The text uses the term “human love” marriages to describe unions that exist outside the legal system. Because these marriages are founded solely on human love, they are not motivated by material possessions or economic interests. They are natural unions between two people, unencumbered by financial considerations. Marriages based on human love provide peace of mind and free both partners from the anxiety that ulterior financial motives can create. This bond is profoundly human and supports emotional well-being. Its simplicity allows a wealthy woman to marry a man of modest means or a wealthy man to marry a woman of modest means without inviting suspicion, because no financial interest is involved. Yet wealthy women who genuinely love men with less money often hesitate to marry them for fear of being pursued for their wealth or status. That fear diminishes human happiness. The text argues that this problem originates with legal marriage. As a legal institution, marriage lacks privacy and intimacy, and the law can make the relationship feel less authentic. In contrast, human love marriages are rooted in genuine emotion. They are celebrated like any other wedding, but without legal formalities. The ceremony may take place in nature on beaches or in forests or in any location the couple chooses, though nature is considered the most appropriate. From this perspective, marriage is a mutual agreement based on the open expression of feeling. Once both individuals have shared their feelings, they are considered married. This differs from traditional church weddings, where couples recite scripted vows that can feel rehearsed or inauthentic, even in religious versions of human love ceremonies, the couple must speak candidly and from the heart. Rings should be personalized with each partner’s name: his bearing hers, and hers bearing his. Seeing the other’s name on the ring helps sustain their feelings during periods of separation due to work or other circumstances. At their core, human love marriages are governed privately through mutual voice agreements. These marriages are grounded in reason. Human love is unconcerned with material things. It focuses exclusively on emotion, respect, and safeguarding love itself, because love is both an act of faith and a deeply felt experience.
