

Origins of the assassins:

The human body is used by thoughts to commit acts of murder.

Thoughts are not physical, but they become physical through the body of the person. Thoughts give people ideas about how to avoid arrest or how to commit crimes in places where they will not be caught. That enables them to carry out the act of killing. Authorities usually catch most murderers and rapists because every baby is fingerprinted at birth. Law enforcement uses those records to identify adults who commit murders and violent crimes. Many murderers feel inferior and seek recognition. As fans of violent music and films, they want news outlets to publish photos and videos of them. That satisfies their desire to live out the murders they have heard in music and seen in movies. The professionalism of that art is, in this view, fraudulent because it makes audiences want to imitate it. In reality, other people become victims when thoughts drive their bodies to commit violence for the sake of notoriety. Uniformed government services do not prevent crimes because the thought to commit the crime occurs in the person first. There is no way to control violent crime at that stage. Movies, series, and music, as entertainment marketed to poor communities, are described here as an origin of crime. Laws do not protect people's mental stability. If they did, the sale of weapons, violent music, and violent movies would not be legal, regardless of whether a buyer is mentally stable. People who are mentally stable can still become vulnerable, because the mind is not fixed. The planet itself has never been criminal and is not a danger to physical life. Because people have free will, they can choose to commit a crime or not. That is why criminals and non-criminals exist. The vast majority of murderers are fans of violent movies and music. Most of those fans are poor people from slums, public housing, and similar areas. Assaults, the text argues, are not merely assaults. If they were, they would not involve firearms or knives. The reality of assault, it claims, is the intent to kill. Whether or not a person becomes a murder victim, life continues.

Physical life is mortal, but the non-physical component is controlled by intangible forces without free will. The origin of physical life is intangible. Thoughts, while intangible, become active and controlling in physical life because of free will, which allows them to be acted on or expressed physically. Physical life, in this view, is like a dream. Everything good or bad returns over time, and people relive it in dreams. Trap, rock, and other music genres are legal to sell, and people believe the music has no effect. But music is a powerful motivator. It can influence people's minds without their realizing it, encouraging murder and premature sex. The soul of one person is connected to the soul of others, and the voice originates in the soul. That is why a voice can be heard from one person to another or recorded: it is non-physical. To market music, singers force their souls into their voices. They hold their breath and sing from the diaphragm to capture the emotions of listeners and raise money from those emotions at concerts. Because money is not positive, the text argues, the only way to obtain it is through toxic means that lead to death and fraud. Sexual and violent music sells more easily for that reason. These singers, it claims, are scammers who exploit music for money. As an effect, their work contributes to murders and underage pregnancy because they manipulate listeners' feelings toward violence and early sex. While these musicians are alive, nothing happens to them. Once they die and lose their physical bodies, they begin a life of horrible nightmares, described here as hell. The same fate applies to fans of artists who promote toxic music. They can never escape that toxic dream because the minds of the artist and the fans were connected to death, weapons, and violence. Movies about murder and drug trafficking are not the primary origin of violence, but they are a secondary one. The primary cause is lack of money, which causes poverty. That poverty leads to the creation of movies and music about murder, drugs, and related topics. These films and songs often come from people who were victims of drug trafficking because of poverty. Poverty is caused by money, which is described as a system with a deadly effect because people die from lack of necessities. Once people have been drug dealers in real life and have done the things depicted in murder movies and drug related music, that lived experience becomes the origin of such films and music.

The effect of murder movies and drug-trafficking music is to motivate the public to imitate what they see and hear. People feel that if they do the same, they will look like the characters in films or the figures in songs. It becomes a trend, as it is today. Although these movies and songs depict drug trafficking and murder, they remain legal for sale because governments have been misled into believing they have no effect. They are, in this view, the origin of endless violence, murder, and drug trafficking. That cycle will continue as long as these products exist and as long as poverty persists. This manipulation of people's feelings through drug-trafficking and murder-themed movies and music occurs because of the need to survive under an economic system based on money. These products sell easily, especially to people who are uneducated or illiterate. Those consumers do not realize they are victims of these films and songs. As adults, they can become drug traffickers, murderers, actors, or singers who spread killing and drug trafficking. The goal, it claims, is for young people to become victims of those stories promoted in movies and music about murder and drug trafficking, so the cycle continues as a fashion that never ends. Physical hell does not exist as described in other sacred texts. According to this text, people who have been real-life victims of drug trafficking, along with actors and singers who spread those stories, try to create a hell on earth through murder, same-sex sexual fraud, and money. But physical hell, it states, does not exist. When a person is murdered or dies an unnatural death rather than of old age the soul, which is the life force within, enters a period of darkness for six minutes. It is unknown what dream the person awakens to after those six minutes. Upon awakening, the soul continues to exist in either a toxic or a positive state, just as it would with a physical body, but without one. This is why people experience dreams: so they do not live in fear of dying of old age and can come to terms with death. Real death is not murder. Murder is a mental fraud in which the perpetrators use their physical bodies to end other lives and prevent those lives from running their natural course. Real death is death from old age, because the person has lived their full physical lifespan. Upon dying, they do not enter darkness but return to the origin of life, which is the life of a dream, bad or good.

The fraudulent films:

The depictions in violent movies are not fictional, because they are based on real events. That realism is what allows them to be made into films. A hidden effect of violent movies is that they help perpetuate new murderers, rapists, and drug dealers. Because these films are produced with high technical skill, viewers feel motivated to imitate the behavior in real life. They believe it is possible to repeat because it actually happened. Another hidden effect is that the producers and actors who make violent movies possible can themselves become victims. People motivated by the films may commit real violence in an attempt to experience the scenes they saw on screen.

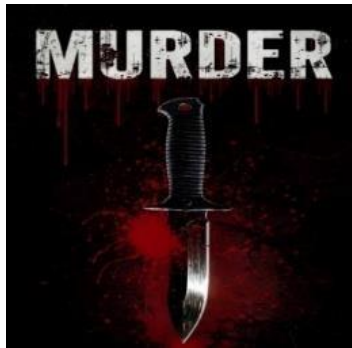

The fraudulent music:

Music is not a lie when shared publicly or with friends and family. Fraudulent music is music that contains lyrical accounts of violence, murder, abuse, and domestic violence. The depictions in violent music videos are not fictional, because the lyrics are based on real incidents that singers have seen or that others have described. That realism allows the songs to be produced. A hidden effect of violent music is that it helps perpetuate new murderers, rapists, and drug dealers. Because the music videos and recordings are produced with high technical skill, listeners feel motivated to imitate the behavior in real life. They believe it is possible to repeat because it actually happened. Another hidden effect is that the producers, singers, and their families who create violent music videos and recordings can themselves become victims. People motivated by the music may commit real violence in an attempt to live out the scenes and lyrics they experienced in the videos and songs.

Fraudulent games:

Interactive games are one of the most powerful forces driving the rise of a new futures of killers, due to their deep psychological impact and their ability to push players toward real world violence. Many modern games are built around realistic scenarios, putting players directly in control as they carry out violent acts on screen in real time. With repeated play, most players do not realize they are slowly losing their aversion to killing while growing more motivated to act. Constant exposure wears down their inhibitions.

Gradually, the urge to kill in real life becomes hard to control and pushes them to act. That impulse does not fade until it is carried out in the real world. It is the product of long-term, subtle conditioning that gives players a sense of purpose in recreating that violence offline. These products are lawful. They are marketed as fun and appealing, yet on massive scales and in largely unseen ways, they manipulate human emotions that carry over into real lives. That is because these games are built on the real lives of people who fall victim to distorted ways of thinking, pushed by economic pressures to earn money through acts of violence. Both the products and the revenues are lawful, but that legality is itself the root of the violence. Prisons miss the points when the laws are the sources of that violence. These revenues exist because we have failed to update our economic systems to give everyone access to financial stability, and because fraudulent practices have normalized products such as violent music and video games. Lawful products contribute to new crimes and prison overcrowding, with billions in public spending to sustain a system whose root cause is itself lawful. The truths are in the impacts, not in the appearances. Ultimately, it's a choice: “ban the product to stop the crimes, or keep it lawful for the sake of the economy”.

The news:

Crime coverage often has a hidden influence on its audience, driven by its popularity and perceived importance, and by the notoriety it gives to criminals. This copycat impulse is fueled by the way these stories are presented: high-impact action shots, dramatic courtroom photos of the defendant whispering to their lawyer, police perp walks that frame the suspect as significant, and all the courtroom drama surrounding the case. This creates a subliminal desire to replicate that attention, to experience the rush that each case generates.

The emotions stirred up by this kind of crime reporting find susceptible viewers, planting a distorted motivation that can create new offenders and keep crime from declining. As long as this coverage remains popular, that incentive will persist. The best way to personally guard against this hidden influence is to change the channel and resist the urge to watch. News outlets will not stop publishing these stories on their own. Crimes, assaults, sexual assaults, and all forms of violence generate millions in revenue. Sensational violent crime is what sustains the salaries of the entire newsroom staff, from reporters to anchors. Viewers of these programs are not only motivated to offend, but are also given ideas on how to commit crimes more effectively and evade justice. The correct way to report on crime is to report the facts while avoiding showing images of the killer, so as not to trigger the hidden motivations that draw in potential new offenders. Faced with these incentives, people are persuaded to commit crimes, creating new criminals who seek to replicate the sensations they first saw in news reports, long before they themselves became offenders. These are the hidden drivers behind the persistence of violence.
