

NEW TIME

Origins of suicides:

Money and memories of abuse both lead to death, and adolescent ignorance plays a role in both. Governments believe money has positive or functional effects on society. That belief is mistaken. People do not fail to value life because they want to devalue it. They fail to value it because they live under constant pressure from the economic system. Poverty and wealth are not defined by money. Poverty and wealth are the happiness or sadness people feel. In economic terms, however, people are classified as poor or rich, and most are poor. People who lose financial control are not afraid of money itself. They fear being unable to meet their basic physical needs, because the economic system controls access to those needs. Money, in this way, manipulates and torments people. Those torments are what other sacred texts describe, but here the focus is money. People who believe in money do so because it appears to meet their needs. In reality, they are being manipulated by money without realizing it. When people are manipulated and reach financial collapse when corporate and personal credit are damaged and jobs are unavailable they feel abandoned and desperate. Because they believed in money, the result can be violence among the poor, violent music, violent films and series, physical and online prostitution of women, drug trafficking, and suicide. Money, or millions of dollars, is generated because the effects described above are violent by design. In exchange for money, suicides and violence persist. Physical goods are not made with money; they are made by people. People are not made with money. Money is an obstacle to obtaining goods. Suicides that are not caused by financial manipulation result from childhood abuse. In childhood, mental stability is not fully formed as it is in adulthood. The abuse may not have an immediate effect during childhood. It becomes effective in adulthood. Memories of lies and abuse remain throughout life until people can no longer bear the burden of those memories or the fact that they were victims of deception. That burden can lead to suicide. Sexual assaults also leave lasting memories that circulate in victims' minds and prevent mental peace. When adult men assault underage girls or adult women assault underage boys, they gain mental access to their victims.

The effect is to implant a bad memory that persists over time and can lead to suicide or to victims being coerced into LGBTTT sexual fraud. Insults directed at Black people, obese people, people deemed unattractive, or people with non-straight hair are also origins of suicide. Victims of bullying and verbal abuse are mentally tormented by those offenses because the insults reflect their realities. They rarely disclose that those offenses are the reason for their torment. The offensive words repeat in their minds over time and can lead them to suicide. Victims do not disclose the true reasons for their suicides because they know it is shameful to say they died because they were poor, unattractive, Black, overweight, or had non-straight hair. Suicide follows because words are powerful, whether spoken, sung, or written. Words go straight to the mind. Pity often falls on people with what the text calls "LGBTTT retardation," but the text asks who pities the person whom an LGBTTT individual tries to defraud by pursuing a same-sex relationship. That, it claims, is the source of rejection. Advertising, it argues, tries to normalize what it calls a "retarded feeling." The LGBTTT feeling is used to defraud the heterosexual gender with same-sex advances. A person with this sexual mentality, it states, faces rejection that leads to degradation, but the choice is between rejection and being a victim of sexual fraud. Suicides are not limited to one form. A modern form of suicide is killing people in public places such as schools, shopping malls, airports, public parks, buildings, or killing public figures like actors and singers. These are suicides because the perpetrators know authorities will kill them. The origin of these massacres is that the perpetrators have seen news coverage of previous attackers. Those attackers looked famous and different. People who commit suicide this way want their deaths to be seen as equally famous and different. The direct reality of suicide is profound, private internal suffering. That suffering is caused by appearances that seem normal but have a fraudulent, hidden depth. The suffering is often concealed out of shame. Appearances look normal and painless, but the hidden effect is deadly. The suffering that is not discussed out of shame includes the lack of real, secure heterosexual human love. It also includes the torment of possible infidelity, lies, spousal abuse, the inability to trust, and the fear of sharing true feelings to avoid disappointments that lead to suicide. Everyone sees how others suffer after falling victim to fraudulent thoughts that give others temporary happiness only to make them suffer. It is fraudulent happiness.

All environments where people have fallen victim to fraudulent happiness prevent men and women who desire true love from achieving it. They fear loving genuinely with real hope because they want true physical happiness and want to avoid suicides caused by false love from one partner. True love is a matter of life or death because there is no escape from authentic, pure feelings. In true love, the mind begins to function for the other: the man's mind for the woman and the woman's mind for the man. When the mind stops functioning for itself and functions for the other, a person experiences true, full, and complete happiness. When love is real in that sense, and because true love is true physical happiness, there is no escape. Love is for life. Suicides occur because there is no escape from a real feeling. The reality of life is not loneliness or singleness; living that way is fraudulent. People kill out of the conviction that all their time together was a scam. They know in silence that the love was not real, that it was a mental fraud. They believed in conquests that existed only in their minds, and they feel no one else can love them or surpass that love, because feelings are for one person in the world. True human physical pleasure is true physical happiness because it reaches the soul directly through heterosexual sex and contact with the real intimate parts of heterosexual women and men. That happiness is available to rich and poor alike because it is human. Money, material things, luxury, millions of dollars, and luxury cars are not human. One cannot have sex with them to achieve the soul's sexual happiness. That leaves men and women to choose between true human happiness and fraudulent material happiness. When you get money, it makes you feel like you have achieved real physical happiness. That defrauds the feeling of true human happiness that comes from true love between men and women. When love is genuine, it is permanent. Each person lives with the deep conviction that they truly have one another. When that love reaches a level of purity where infidelity is unthinkable, any betrayal would be devastating like a kind of death because there is no escaping real love. Love exists in the mind, and the mind bonds to that true, heterosexual love forever. Honesty is important. It helps you understand how you feel. Do not lie. When you tell the truth, both people understand what is really happening. Then both people can be happy. Many people are not happy. They do not say it because they feel shame. They do not have a strong connection with another person. That connected is what makes people feel complete and happy. Without it, people feel alone.

Physical evidence that could indicate suicide:

These are acts of humility that express and demonstrate true human love through actions rather than words. Love expressed solely through words is often hard to believe, because words can be deceptive. They may sound sincere or insincere. Actions are more credible because they are physical and provide real evidence. Acts that appear superficial can, in fact, express genuine love. Sincere words are best confirmed through genuine hugs and caresses. While these gestures can be faked, two signs indicate whether they are authentic.

A woman humiliated by true love:

A men humiliated by true love:

In most cases, insults and harsh words are ways of masking underlying feelings of love. Evidence of love is often present beneath these negative behaviors. These seemingly hurtful acts, such as insults and demeaning remarks, often occur without causing a breakup, even when they happen repeatedly. The relationship endures because these acts are a distorted or misguided way of expressing love. These false displays of anger and hurtful words are not genuine expressions of hostility. They are common behaviors, often directed from women to men. Many times, these seemingly humiliating acts are not truly humiliating. They are ways of expressing the truth of one's love. If a marriage or romantic relationship ends after both partners have demonstrated sincerity, transparency, and genuine love, and one partner insists it is over, the affected person may die by suicide due to unbearable emotional suffering. That suffering comes from being unable to recover mentally, because heterosexual love is presented here as the true happiness of the soul and of human life. In this view, responsibility for the suicide lies with the other person, man or woman, who did not share the same genuine love.
