

Origin of infidelity:

Single infidelity occurs when men and women are only seeking sex. The effects of sexually transmitted infections are the same whether the infidelity occurs in a marriage, a dating relationship, or outside one. Expressing true feelings for each other sustains physical happiness. When both people listen to each other's true feelings, infidelity is unlikely. Otherwise, the probability of infidelity is high. Controlling sexual activity creates opportunities to look at each other and bring sexual imagination to life, even while fully clothed. Sexual happiness during the act is exciting for the soul. Without that, there is a high probability of infidelity caused by sexual saturation. Sex should not occur every day. Spacing it out provides time for proper hygiene before the sexual act, which helps avoid disappointments that are incompatible with sexual desire, such as unshaved intimate areas or bad odors. Men and women sleeping in the same room is a mistake, because rest is a private, personal matter unrelated to marriage or relationships. Freedom is essential. Sleeping together violates that freedom because physical contact between bodies disrupts an individual's ability to rest. Other reasons men and women should not share a bedroom include differences in hygiene. A woman may be embarrassed and may not want a man to see her bathing, and vice versa. Making love is a profound and serious experience, without games or laughter, because it is a powerful and intense feeling of human happiness. Men and women touch each other's souls through the connection of their intimate parts, the vagina and penis. The origin of sexually transmitted diseases lies in infidelity. Infidelity is common among acquaintances, and when someone is unfaithful, happiness, emotions, and sexual security collapse. Sexual insecurity and unhappiness begin, which can lead to mental torment and suffering related to fears of contracting sexually transmitted diseases. Over time, this can lead to suicide if one lives with the infection, or to death if it is HIV. A lack of sexual desire is often mistaken for infidelity.

While that can be true, there are other reasons: poor hygiene, worry, job loss, the death of family members, and other personal issues that disrupt sexual desire. If none of these reasons are present, infidelity is likely occurring but goes unspoken out of shame. Infidelity is not a mistake; it is a conscious act committed by choice, out of curiosity, or simply from wanting sex with others. The person knows they are being unfaithful. If infidelity occurs, there is no love involved no real feelings, only fraudulent words of love. Infidelity should not be forgiven, because the likelihood of it happening again increases over time, even after apologies and reconciliations. Once the fear of being unfaithful is lost, the probability that it will happen again years later is high. For these reasons, infidelity should not be forgiven, because the suffering is doubled and compounded by the silence of the affected men and women. Threesomes are a form of authorized infidelity. When couples share or exchange partners out of affection for friends, the risk that the relationship will end is high due to the lies involved. When couples share their boyfriend, girlfriend, husband, or wife with best friends, or for other reasons, love or feelings are often replaced or eliminated in a significant percentage of cases. If they secretly prefer the partner in the threesome, they will hide the truth out of shame. Over time, after the threesome, there is a high probability of breakups or divorce. This happens because sex is a feeling. Even if it is not love, sex still creates a feeling through bodily contact. If that feeling surpasses the feeling of love, or if there is a greater preference, the original feeling is replaced. This causes breakups, suffering, problems, and even death. When curiosity arises, love is neither firm nor real. Infidelity replaces or destroys feelings of love for the other person. Gender-based violence originates in thoughts of infidelity, which exert strong pressure on the minds of men and women when they separate. Expressing fidelity and not pressuring each other helps eradicate gender-based violence. Infidelity does not take just one form. It varies depending on each person's skill in committing it and making it seem as if it never happened. In other words, infidelity is not the same for everyone; it depends on how the woman or man carries it out. The toxic reasons that lead heterosexual men and women to suicide, drug use, and alcoholism that is, the effects of infidelity are strong.

This occurs when feelings, love, and mental happiness are one-sided rather than mutual. The harmful and even deadly effects of infidelity happen when a man tells a woman the truth, but she lies internally, or when a woman tells the truth, but the man lies internally. In other words, when both genders are deceived, it can lead to suicide or other fraudulent sexual practices. This happens when a person expresses the truth of love with complete purity body and soul by giving everything, which means speaking the truth as one feels it, and where happiness is genuine. When that person becomes a victim of infidelity after giving everything, meaning the truth of their feelings, it can lead them to abandon life through alcohol, drugs, suicide, and so on. A lack of sexual desire is often mistaken for infidelity. While that can be true, other reasons include lack of money, unpleasant odors in intimate areas, fatigue from lying about love, discomfort, worry, job loss, family deaths, and emotional issues that interrupt sexual desire. If none of these reasons are present, infidelity is almost certainly occurring, even if shame prevents the true reasons from being revealed. Infidelity is more common with people you know or have affection for, and with ex-partners, because there is trust that can be betrayed at any time. It is easier to commit because of that trust. Infidelity, gender-based violence, and heterosexual romantic disappointments caused by the mistaken belief that all women or all men are the same lead heterosexual men and women to experiment with fraudulent same-sex relationships, or rather, with what is called a fraudulent LGBTQ+ gender identity. When these experiments from heterosexuality to LGBTQ+ occur, the sexual mindset worsens over time. The person attempts to deceive their own mind into believing that fraudulent LGBTQ+ men and women are real men and women. Over time, this attempt fails, because a lie cannot overcome the truth. The desire to return to heterosexuality becomes impossible because past thoughts from the time they experienced LGBTQ+ fraud remain for life. This prevents people from finding happiness in heterosexuality alone. This framework rejects the premise that happiness is derived exclusively from heterosexuality. Authentic love is interpersonal and not contingent upon material conditions.

Physical of the effects of thoughts of infidelity:

Infidelity is a thought that is always present, whether at close range or long distance. Advertising and media promote ways to be unfaithful and suggest that it is possible to have peace of mind from a distance, because lies can cover up any act of infidelity. Infidelity, or the thought of possible infidelity, torments both men and women, but men more so. As a hidden effect, that torment prevents men from showing calm, loving tenderness as a husband or boyfriend. Combined with economic crises, thoughts of infidelity lead to heterosexual breakups.

Thoughts of infidelity arise in many ways because there are many opportunities to be unfaithful. The hidden purpose of these thoughts is to cause heterosexual couples to break up. That process involves arguments and aggression from both partners domestic violence designed to eliminate all heterosexual feelings.

After thoughts of infidelity cause breakups through domestic violence, they work to ensure that bad memories prevent people from wanting other heterosexual relationships.
